. . . somebody gets shot. Somebody gets killed. It's sort of like the subliminal. And then the media has a little bit of power, and it can cause people to get shot." In the early 1970s, Thurgood Marshall said that the Supreme Court decision in Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, upholding the Civil Rights Act's Affirmative Action Program, "makes plain to all the world that the time is long past due that the Supreme Court restore the exclusive prerogative of the people to establish the laws they want." Thurgood Marshall said this because of the Title VII case of United States v. Lee Lacy, which struck down the Civil Rights Act of 1964. In the 1974 film The Thomas Crown Affair, Matt Helm is asked by his lover, a black model named Blanche Devereaux, "Why don't you want to sleep with a black woman?" he replies, "Because black women are all the same." In 1974's The Great Gatsby, Tom Buchanan tells Meyer Wolfsheim, a German millionaire and his business partner, that he'll take care of all of the "political and racial problems" of the South for them, and that the "solid South is going to be solid . . . for a long time to come." Wolfsheim replies, "It's too late for that." In the 1980s, the Ku Klux Klan sought to return to prominence by becoming more active in the South. One of their most prominent local leaders was David Duke, a former member of the Louisiana State Senate. He was a strong supporter of Anita Bryant, and also attracted considerable media attention when he said that he was considering running for President of the United States. He also ran for lieutenant governor of Louisiana in 1983. In the mid-1980s, several prominent European intellectuals made a concerted effort to enlist the United States in an anti-Apartheid campaign that sought to isolate South Africa. They were: Gunther Anders, Willy Brandt, Ove Arup, Nene Aronowicz, Christa Asmussen, Albert O. Hirschman, Daniel Guerin, Alexander and J[ohn] Habermas, S[an] Kaltenbach, Julius Klieman, Hermann Lübbe, Günter Naumann, I[ohn] Petersen, Tibor Radvanyi, Victor Schall; Karlheinz Weiss, 82157476af
